Historical/Biographical Background

The last of Monmouth College’s famous literary societies to be formed, the Aletheorean Society served as the antithesis to the Amateurs des Belle Lettres Society in that it was the other women’s only literary society on campus. Much like the Eccritean Society was to the Philadelphian Society, the Aletheorean Society competed against the A.B.L. as well as groups from other colleges and universities. Formed five years after the A.B.L., the group’s motto, “Aude Sapere,” or “Dare To Be Wise” was considered unusual for a Women’s society of the time, but none the less reflected the attitude of these women.
